saying on a February evening a good many years ago an elderly gentleman in evening dress flung himself out of his cab which had just stopped before a house in Bruton Street and hastily went to meet a young man who was at the same moment stepping out of another hansom a little farther down the pavement The pleasure in the older man's voice rang clear and the younger met him with an equal cordiality expressed perhaps through a manner more leisurely and restrained So you are home Sir Wilfrid You were announced I saw But I thought Paris would have detained you a bit Paris Not I Half the people I ever knew there are dead and the rest are uncivil Well and how are you getting on Making your fortune eh And slipping his arm inside the young man's the speaker walked back with him along a line of carriages towards a house which showed a group of footmen at its open door Jacob Delafield smiled The business of a land agent seems to be to spend some one else's as far as I've yet gone Land agent I thought you were at the bar I was but the briefs didn't come in My cousin offered me the care of his Essex estates I like the country always have So I thought I'd better accept What the Duke Lucky fellow A regular income and no anxieties I expect you're pretty well paid Oh I'm not badly paid replied the young man tranquilly Of course you're going to Lady Henry's Of course Here we are The older man paused outside the line of servants waiting at the door and spoke in a lower tone How is she Failing at all Jacob Delafield hesitated She's grown very blind and perhaps rather more infirm generally But she is at home as usual every evening for a few people and for a good many on Wednesdays Is she still alone or is there any relation who looks after her Relation No She detests them all Except you
