Stress in sport is associated with poor athletic performance. It is possible to improve the way a person reacts to stress and therefore to enhance sports performance by applying:

- regular relaxation techniques to produce physiological changes and reduce excessive sympathetic activity to allow the athlete to perform calmly in competition;
- a specific goal performance technique. Goals are set against a target point score determined from previous test performance and the athlete is trained to achieve this target score. Goals are set at intervals of 10-15% and the athlete is given a reward for reaching the target score.

Stress is a biologic response to a stimulus and it is possible to control the way the athlete reacts to stress. Stress itself does not harm performance. It is the athlete's response to stress that may harm performance. It is the athlete's response to stress that may harm performance. It is the athlete's response to stress that may harm performance.
