

Week 10 - 10/10/2020

1. Introduction

1.1. Introduction

- The first step in the design process is to define the problem. This involves identifying the requirements and constraints of the system.
- The next step is to develop a conceptual design. This involves creating a high-level overview of the system and its components.
- The third step is to develop a detailed design. This involves creating a more in-depth plan of the system, including the selection of components and the definition of their interfaces.
- The fourth step is to build and test the system. This involves constructing the physical system and verifying that it meets the requirements.
- The final step is to document the design. This involves creating a comprehensive record of the design process, including the requirements, the design decisions, and the test results.

3. Design Tools

3.1. Design Tools

- Computer-aided design (CAD) software: This software is used to create 2D and 3D models of the system.
- Finite element analysis (FEA) software: This software is used to analyze the stress and strain on the system.
- Computational fluid dynamics (CFD) software: This software is used to analyze the flow of fluids around the system.
- Multibody dynamics (MBD) software: This software is used to analyze the motion of the system.
- System dynamics (SD) software: This software is used to analyze the behavior of the system over time.
- Control systems software: This software is used to design and simulate control systems for the system.

4. Design Results

4.1. Design Results

- The design results are the output of the design process. They include the final design, the test results, and the documentation.
- The final design is a detailed plan of the system, including the selection of components and the definition of their interfaces.
- The test results are the results of the tests performed on the system. They provide evidence that the system meets the requirements.
- The documentation is a comprehensive record of the design process, including the requirements, the design decisions, and the test results.

5. Design Review

5.1. Design Review

- The design review is a formal process for reviewing the design. It involves a team of experts who review the design and provide feedback.
- The design review is typically held at the end of the design process, after the final design has been developed.
- The design review is a critical part of the design process, as it allows the team to identify and correct any errors or omissions before the system is built.
