

KRAAK I

When the Dutch East India Company (VOC) arrived in the East Indies in 1601, they brought with them a new style of pottery, known as Kraak. This style was a blend of Chinese and Dutch influences, and it became popular in the Netherlands and other parts of Europe.

The Kraak style was characterized by its blue and white color scheme and its intricate designs. It often featured floral motifs, geometric patterns, and figures. The designs were typically hand-painted, giving each piece a unique appearance.

One of the most common Kraak pieces was the plate. These plates often had a central medallion or a wide border with a repeating pattern. The designs were usually in blue, but some pieces were painted in other colors like red or green.

The Kraak style was not just limited to plates. There were also bowls, vases, and other types of pottery. The designs were often very similar to those on the plates, creating a cohesive look for the collection.

The Kraak style was a significant part of the Dutch colonial heritage. It represents a unique blend of cultures and a testament to the Dutch East India Company's influence in the East Indies.
