of an instrument generally can reflect the perceived psychopathology construct (e.g., level of pain). Other more complex forms of items (e.g., pain increasing if another person is in a room) may be used to assess dimensions of a construct (e.g., social anxiety) that are not easily measured by a single item (Cronbach 1951). Having only one item does not mean an item is a poor measure of a construct and good evidence exists that the item works (Furukawa 1998).
