Another source is the United States Department of Justice, Office of the Inspector General, "The National Transportation Security Council's Review of the Transportation Security Administration's Response to the September 11, 2001 Terrorist Attacks," OIG Report No. 03-001, dated March 2003, at 10-11. The report states that the TSA's response to the September 11 attacks was "inadequate" and that the TSA's "lack of coordination with other agencies" was a major factor in the failure to prevent the attacks. The report also states that the TSA's "lack of communication with the public" was a major factor in the failure to prevent the attacks.

As a consequence of the changes introduced in the 1990s, the system of public health control has been transformed into a management system. The role of the state in the health sector has been reduced, and the responsibility for health care has been shifted to the private sector. The state has been reduced to a regulatory role, and the private sector has become the main provider of health services. This has led to a significant increase in the cost of health care, and a corresponding increase in the inequality of access to health services. The state has been unable to maintain its role as a provider of health services, and the private sector has been unable to provide the same level of care as the state. This has led to a significant increase in the cost of health care, and a corresponding increase in the inequality of access to health services.
