Monsieur ought to know This dialogue was by no means new Ang lique and her master exchanged similar remarks every time that game or poultry came to the table It was not flippantly it was certainly not to save herself trouble that the old servant persisted in offering her master the carving knife as a token of the respect which was due to him In the peasant class from which she had sprung and also in the little middle class households where she had been in service it was a tradition that it was the master s duty to carve The faithful old soul s respect for tradition was profound She did not think it right that Monsieur Bergeret should fall short of it that he should delegate to her the performance of so authoritative a function that he should fail to carve at his own table since he was not grand enough to employ a butler to do it for him like the Br c s the Bonmonts and other such folk in town or country She knew the obligations which honour imposes on a citizen who dines at home and she never failed to impress them upon Monsieur Bergeret
