What is Morality?

Gert (2011), cites two definitions of morality; the first being descriptive in nature, whereas the second is normative. Descriptive morality refers to some codes of conduct put forward by a society or some other group such as a religion or accepted by an individual through his or her behavior and beliefs. Normative morality on the other hand, refers to a code of conduct that given specific conditions, would be put forward by all rational persons.

This latter definition forms a basis for individual behavioral patterns. Gert (2011), does point out that those different moral theories vary in defining a rational person and their subsequent application of code of conduct as a moral code. He explains that the term morality is rarely used in solitude; rather a qualification is attached to it, for example Christian morality. He also explains that most anthropologists compare morality to law, which gets relevance only within a society. He further expounds that etiquette forms part of morality and in this case he is not referring to manners, rather good qualities that promote harmonious living with other mankind.

Touching on law and legal systems, he says that though it is distinguished from morality, there is a mutual relationship, since morality forms the basis for the evaluation and interpretation of laws. He further distinguishes religion from morality which he describes as being inclusive of past events, discussing the supernatural and is used to justify behavior that it (religion) prohibits or requires.
