with comments by the compiler Hugh Miller's Memoir Hugh Miller, 1995 The centrepiece of this book is the autobiographical memoir written by the celebrated Scottish geologist writer and newspaper editor Hugh Miller from 1829 to 1830 It is by any standards a remarkable document from a remarkable man Vivid and for its time unusually informative it offers a rare insight into the life and thinking of a figure whose violent progress through school in Cromarty and stormy apprenticeship as a stonemason inspired him to seek refuge in the world of letters Studies in the Literary Imagination
,2010 The Modern Language Journal ,1936 Includes section Reviews French Existentialism Frederick Kingston, 1961-12-15 In this study the author makes a comparison between the two main types of existentialism the Christian and the non Christian The comparison is made on four levels first the common situation second the possibility and means of communication third the chosen methods of philosophy and fourth the attitude and interpretations in relation to similar subjects Although the French existentialists have been greatly influenced by Kierkegaard and by contemporary existentialist thought in Germany Switzerland Italy Spain and the United States the study is limited to the existentialism of contemporary French writers France in the last fifty years has experienced some of the most crucial events of her history and this common setting for both Christian and non Christian man turns to Christianity and another militant atheism It is particularly in France that the split is most clearly made between these two varieties of existentialist thought Dr Kingston handles the issues in a fair and honest way neither concealing his own position nor dealing unfairly with those of whom he is most critical The intelligent English reader lay or academic will find this an excellent introduction to a whole area of modern French life and thought with which he is unlikely to be well acquainted Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century ,1993
