

90 Alejandra originally operated as a sole trader. However, as the business grew it became clear that she needed the protection of limited liability and so she changed the business to a private limited company, LadyA Management Limited (LAM). Alejandra herself owned 98% of the shares in LAM. Her parents and Ruth Liebermann owned the remaining 2%.

95 Technology was changing the music industry. In 2000, online file sharing software became widely available. Though the file sharing of copyrighted material was usually illegal, many people did it anyway, especially young people. The sales of CD albums began to fall. This trend continued with the emergence of other new technologies such as MP3 players and smartphones. Another important technological change was video hosting websites, which effectively ended the direct profitability of music videos. Before video hosting websites, musicians received royalties for videos that appeared on television. Now, artists such as LadyA 100 had to produce their own videos and upload them to video hosting websites. These productions were expensive, but did not generate any direct revenue.

105 The definition of a successful musician was also changing. With falling sales revenue from music (a problem made worse by the economic downturn that began in 2008), artists had to transform themselves into "media personalities" and find ways to generate revenue from these branded identities, just as Ruth had predicted. In 2009, LadyA started appearing in many above the line and below the line promotions of various types of products. LadyA was always very careful about which products she endorsed. Each one had to strengthen her brand identity as a beautiful, mainstream American, yet one with Hispanic passion and intensity. She also began communicating with her fans through various social networking websites.

110 In 2010, LadyA started offering her own product line of perfume and cosmetics, promoted under the name LadyA. Primary and secondary market research had showed that perfume and cosmetics would best connect with LadyA's established brand and help her reach her main target market: teenage girls and young women. The production of LadyA perfume and cosmetics was outsourced, to an established manufacturer in Malaysia, where costs were 115 much lower. Quality control could, however, be a problem. The Malaysian manufacturer would produce LadyA perfume and cosmetics using batch production which would enable a variety of products to be made; LadyA would have to pay 60% of the costs in advance. The wholesaling and distribution was also outsourced, to a company in Minnesota. By 2011, LadyA perfume and cosmetics were sold in a nation-wide chain of department stores in the US.

120 At the same time, Alejandra decided to reorganize the business. She continued to manage all of her household employees personally. She appointed a Managing Director, and a Human Resources Manager to assist in workforce planning and manage the rest of the business. She delegated some business functions, but kept a very close interest in all decisions through her meetings with the Managing Director. One benefit of this reorganization was that, with clear 125 roles, systems and procedures in place, Alejandra's employees complained less.

On a personal level, 2012 was a big year for Alejandra. She married Rafaele Eco, an Italian investment banker, and they purchased a large mansion in Hollywood, requiring an even greater number of peripheral employees. Over the next few years, LadyA was at the peak of her media power, wealth, and fame. She was more mature and business-oriented than when she was 130 in her twenties. Her leadership style had matured as well. She became more consistent and paternalistic.
