Question 14.12:

Define the following as related to proteins

- (i) Peptide linkage (ii) Primary structure (iii) Denaturation.

Answer 14.12:

- (i) The amide formed between -COOH group of one molecule of an amino acid and -NH_2 group of another molecule of the amino acid by the elimination of a water molecule is called a peptide linkage.

- (ii) The primary structure of protein refers to the specific sequence in which various amino acids are present in it, i.e., the sequence of linkages between amino acids in a polypeptide chain. The sequence in which amino acids are arranged is different in each protein. A change in the sequence creates a different protein.
- (iii) In a biological system, a protein is found to have a unique 3-dimensional structure and a unique biological activity. In such a situation, the protein is called native protein. However, when the native protein is subjected to physical changes such as change in temperature or chemical changes such as change in pH, its H-bonds are disturbed. This disturbance unfolds the globules and uncoils the helix. As a result, the protein loses its biological activity. This loss of biological activity by the protein is called denaturation. During denaturation, the secondary and the tertiary structures of the protein get destroyed, but the primary structure remains unaltered. One of the examples of denaturation of proteins is the coagulation of egg white when an egg is boiled.

Question 14.13:

What are the common types of secondary structure of proteins?

Answer 14.13:

There are two common types of secondary structure of proteins:

- (i) α -helix structure (ii) β -pleated sheet structure α -

Helix structure: In this structure, the -NH group of an amino acid residue forms H-bond with the >C=O group of the adjacent turn of the right-handed screw (α -helix).
