In this next investigation, you will use a model that has many of the same mechanisms in it that it had before. One change to the simulation is the way that the individual bacteria can vary in the starting population. Bacteria don't just vary based on color; they also vary slightly in the structure of their cell membranes:

Notice that each of these four bacteria have a different number of pores (holes) in their cell membranes:

- The purple one shown on the left has three pores in its cell membrane.
- The second one is green and it has four pores in its cell membrane.
- The third one is brown and it has five pores in its cell membrane.
- The fourth one is red and it has six pores in its cell membrane.

PREDICT: Investigation 1

1. If antibiotic particles are released into the simulation, will those particles have the same chance of destroying each of these variations of bacteria when they reach them? Explain.

Antibiotic particles released into a simulation will not necessarily have the same chance of destroying all due to the phenomenon of antibiotic resistance. the different bacteria
