INTRODUCTION

At the time of conception, a single-celled fertilized human egg contains approximately 100,000 genes. However, the genetic information contained in these 100,000 genes is not all expressed at the same time. Genes are "turned on" (transcribed and translated) and "turned off" throughout the life of the organism at appropriate times. For instance, genes that direct the development of fingers and toes in humans are "on" for a brief time during early development. After a fetus develops fingers and toes, the gene products needed for digit production are no longer needed. These genes are turned off and remain off for the rest of the person's life.

An operon is a section of DNA responsible for "turning on" and "turning off" the genes at specific times. An operon contains structural genes (genes that code for polypeptides), a promoter (initiation site where transcription begins), and an operator (the binding site for the repressor protein). Repressor proteins prevent transcription of mRNA by RNA polymerase by binding to the operator.

The lac operon is the operon that allows the body to metabolize and utilize lactose (absorbed from the intestinal environment) as a source of energy.

In the presence of lactose, the lac operon is "turned on" and the Lac Z, Lac Y, and Lac A enzymes coded for by genes on the lac operon can be synthesized and the lactose can be metabolized. In the absence of lactose, the transcription and translation of these genes is repressed or "turned off."

In this lab, students are given background information on gene expression. Students will then use a simple model to illustrate how and when the lac operon is turned on and off. A worksheet is also included, to reinforce and test students' understanding of concepts discussed and demonstrated in the lab.

This kit includes enough materials for 15 student lab stations. Students may work individually or in small groups.
