How to Recycle a Pumpkin

1.5 billion pounds of pumpkins are grown each year in the U.S. and a more recognized symbol of fall. Pickering, a pumpkin farmer, is one of America's best. His garden treasures are to be enjoyed. Pumpkins are nutritious and practical ways to recycle them. If you are a food lover, one of the best ways to use them is to make pumpkin puree. Pumpkin puree is the key to many recipes. There are even many delicious ways to create a delectable fall treat. To make pumpkin into puree that can be used in soups and pulp; then cut the pumpkin into small pieces, scoop the softened pumpkin out, and the result will be an almost-liquid puree.

Another way to get food from your pumpkin is to make pumpkin soup, a popular snack, and they are an excellent source of fiber. To roast your own pumpkin seeds, simply cut the pumpkin in half, scoop out the pulp, and bake them in a single layer on a baking sheet. Add butter and add salt, or you can simply roast them up.

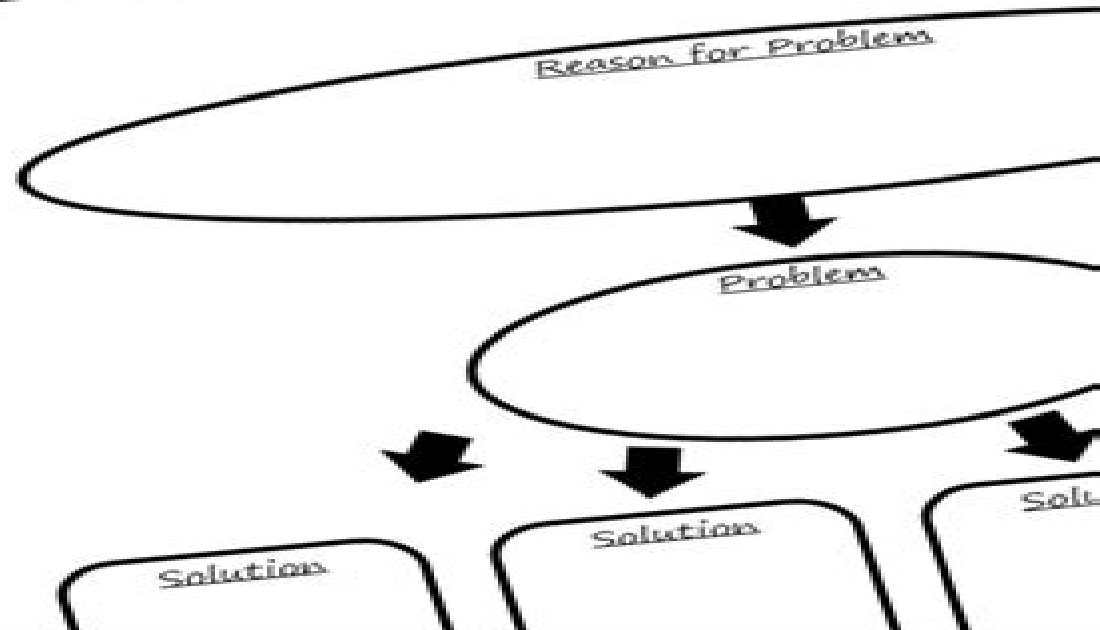

If you are not a fan of eating pumpkin, or you don't want to make a pie, don't worry; you can still use them in many ways. A simple way to recycle a pumpkin is to use it as a planter. Cut a hole in a planned compost pile or simply use it as a planter. In the process, unload plenty of compost. Pumpkins can make a garden look beautiful. They make a perfect pot for a plant? Cut a hole in the bottom and another small hole on the bottom as a drainage hole. When the pumpkin begins to rot, the decaying pumpkin will act as a natural fertilizer.
