

MICROBIAL GENETICS All living things use DNA to procreate their species, to continue living as a species. Species' characteristics are all contained in the DNA code for that organism. The code for what makes a species a species is its genome. The genome is one copy of all the genetic information contained in a cell. Viruses are not cells but do have a genome. The genome essentially consists of all the DNA (or in the case of some viruses, RNA) which includes the genes that are used to make that being and anything made for that being's survival. There are many different types of primates, but each species of primate has its own genome. Each species has a genome that is different than any other creature. There are, however, differences in individuals within a species, but these differences are due to differences in the same genes within the genome. To make more of the same species, the DNA must be copied, or a replica of the DNA must be made to be passed on to the organism's progeny. What I will do here is provide a very simplified version of what really happens. It is already a complex process just looking at a brief overview.

DNA REPLICATION We will look at prokaryotic DNA replication. In eukaryotes, it is much more complex with many more enzymes and other special proteins.

A. DEOXYRIBOSE

C. THE SUGAR PHOSPHATE BACKBONE The backbone of nucleic acids is the sugar bonded to a phosphate group which is bonded to the sugar "above" it which is bonded to the phosphate group "above" it and so on throughout the entire strand of the molecule. Since this sequence is repeated throughout the molecule, we only indicate the base attached to that nucleotide when "writing out" the DNA or RNA strand in question. In Molecular Biology, there are rules as to which strand is used.

D. NUCLEOTIDES (review)
