

Chapter 1

Society: It refers to human beings and to the social structures they collectively create.

General systems theory argues that all organisms are open to and interact with their external environments.

Systems theory helps us understand how business and society are taken together and form an interactive social system.

The stakeholder theory of the firm argues that corporations serve a broad public purpose to create value for society.

Stakeholder: People and groups that affect, or are affected by, an organization's decisions, policies, and operations.

Are managers, especially top executives, stakeholders?

- Yes, stakeholders and managers are impacted by the firm's decisions.

Market stakeholders: Those that engage in economic transactions with the company as it carries out its purpose of providing society with goods and services.

Nonmarket stakeholders: People and groups do not engage in direct economic exchange with the firm are nonetheless affected by or can affect its actions.

Internal stakeholders: Are those, such as employees and managers, who are employed by the firm. They are "inside" the firm, in the sense that they contribute their effort and skill, usually at a company worksite.

External stakeholders: Are those who may have important transactions with the firm and are not directly employed by it.

Focal organization: The organization from whose perspective the analysis is conducted.

Stakeholder analysis: An important part of the modern manager's job is to identify relevant stakeholders and to understand both their interests and the power they may have to assert these interests.

Stakeholder power: The ability to use resources to make an event happen or to secure a desired outcome.

Boundary-spanning departments: Departments, or offices, within an organization that reach across the dividing line that separates the company from groups and people in society.

- Who are the relevant stakeholders?

Relevant stakeholders are some customers, creditors, retailers, and owners.

- What are the interests of each stakeholder?

Each stakeholder has a unique relationship to the organization, and managers must respond accordingly.
