Sensation	Perception
Sensation is the process by which the sensory system receives information from the environment. It is a bottom-up process, meaning that it starts with the raw data of the environment and moves up to the brain for interpretation. Sensation is a passive process, meaning that it does not involve any active interpretation or judgment. It is a direct process, meaning that it is not influenced by any other factors. It is a local process, meaning that it is limited to the specific sensory system that is receiving the information. It is a specific process, meaning that it is focused on a particular aspect of the environment. It is a momentary process, meaning that it is only present for a brief moment in time.	Perception is the process by which the brain interprets the information received by the sensory system. It is a top-down process, meaning that it starts with the brain's interpretation of the information and moves down to the sensory system. It is an active process, meaning that it involves active interpretation and judgment. It is an indirect process, meaning that it is influenced by many factors. It is a global process, meaning that it is not limited to the specific sensory system that is receiving the information. It is a general process, meaning that it is focused on the overall meaning of the information. It is a lasting process, meaning that it is present for a long time.
