

rear will stop more quickly and with less rider effort.

And as long as we're voicing complaints, we must bad-mouth a KTM seat once again. The 350's seat lets the rider move about easily, but it has squarish top edges and absolutely rock-hard foam that makes day-long rides pure torture. If you've noticed that KTM riders stand up a lot, the seat is probably the reason.

But while standing or sitting on the 350, riders of a wide variety of sizes and riding styles will probably notice that the bike is narrow through the mid-section. The large gas tank is narrow at its rear but spreads the rider's legs quite a bit when he moves forward for a tight turn, although not objectionably so. And the weirdly ben exhaust pipe keeps its hot parts a good distance away from the rider's leg, yet provides more ground clearance than do most stock pipes. Riders who do a lot of riding in the mud, however, will find the footpegs very slippery, a problem that has bothered KTMs for too long a time.

Another KTM tradition—that of supplying all the required enduro hardware only as an option—has been at least partially broken with the 350. A headlight and taillight are standard equipment on this bike, so only the odometer and the spark arrester/muffler are extra-cost items.

Depending upon your riding ability and riding style, then, the new KTM 350 Enduro is either a marvelous new model or simply a new model with first-year teething problems. It is an Open bike that is as agile as a 250, with a powerband much like an extra-powerful 250's, and an engine that starts easily and runs cleanly. But it can't be torqued through a mud bog or a sandwash in whatever gear you happen to be in, and it doesn't have the relaxed straight-line stability of a 400 Husky.

None of this means that KTM's 350 Enduro is not a worthy machine. It just means that the bike is a different approach to the same goal: winning enduros. In the hands of an expert rider, the KTM is quite capable of achieving that goal. But for a less-than-experienced dirt rider, riding a KTM 350 Enduro won't move that goal one bit closer.
