

LUBRICATING OIL PUMP AND OIL FILTER Lubrication System

The oil pump is driven by the crankshaft and is responsible for circulating oil throughout the engine. It draws oil from the sump and pumps it to the oil filter and then to the various lubrication points.

The oil filter is designed to remove contaminants from the oil, ensuring that only clean oil is circulated. There are two main types of oil filters: mechanical and chemical.

Mechanical filters use a physical barrier to trap dirt and debris. Chemical filters use a chemical process to break down contaminants.

Regular oil changes and filter replacements are essential for maintaining engine health and performance.

The oil pump and filter are critical components of the lubrication system. They work together to ensure that the engine is always supplied with clean, pressurized oil.

When inspecting the oil pump and filter, look for signs of wear, leaks, and contamination. If any issues are found, they should be addressed immediately.

Proper maintenance of the lubrication system is key to extending the life of the engine.
