
These studies showed that following rapid re-examination, the rate of positive responses following a subsequent memory strengthening strategy (practice) was higher than the rate of positive responses following a no-strengthening strategy. This indicates that the effects of the strategy of following memory strengthening practice on subsequent test results are mediated by the effects of the strategy on the degree to which the test-retest interval is perceived as a period of forgetting. This is consistent with the idea that the effects of the strategy on subsequent test results are mediated by the effects of the strategy on the degree to which the test-retest interval is perceived as a period of forgetting.

These authors provide a useful overview of the various methods used to estimate the impact of the environment on health. They also discuss the importance of the environment in the development of disease and the need for further research in this area.
