Money Supply Income And Prices In Sudan:

Money Supply, Income and Prices in Sudan Mohamed Osman, Issam Mohamed, Prof Issam Aw Mohamed, 2014-12-02

The principles of adjusting money supply to the real size of an economy's ability to produce commodities and services are generally ignored in developing countries. With the application of economic measurement tools, many abnormal signs would be observed in Sudan's case that is true but with enlarged effects on the economic general performance. Impacts affect the viability of the economy and the ability to survive.

Impacts of Money Supply on Income and Prices in the Sudan

Issam Aw Mohamed, 2012-02 Monetary policies are very important in any economy. However, they are dominantly hectic and characterized with frequent changes in developing countries. In Sudan, there were many changes during the past three decades, mostly were not compatible with coherent economic logic. The country's economy degenerated from being the leading African economy after dependence in 1956 to the 1960s to stand on the brink of economic extinction in the 2000s and virtual bankruptcy in 2012. Frequent changes in macroeconomic policies affected the essence and logic of money supply and demand. That eventually affected the economic sectors and their productive abilities.

The economy of Sudan suffers from major structural imbalances among them the imbalance between consumption and savings. This fundamental imbalance is closely tied to many others including for example those between imports and exports between investment and domestic savings between installed physical capacity and management capacity between external debt service obligations and debt service capacity and between public expenditure and public revenues. After a brief review of recent economic developments, this report examines the relationship between pricing and other resource allocation policies and the development and resolution of these structural imbalances. The report concludes with an analysis of Sudan's medium term economic prospects. This analysis indicates that even with pricing and complementary policies that would lead to strong export growth, tight controls on imports, restrained consumption, developments needed to restore basic economic balances, the external debt burden is so extraordinarily large that about half the scheduled debt service each year will need to be rescheduled or forgiven if Sudan is to avoid an economic contraction. To carry out this program of economic recovery, major efforts will be required both by Sudan and by the donor community.
