What are the components of a small system for wastewater?

Background

A wastewater treatment system consists of a number of treatment and process building blocks, which are connected in series to treat the wastewater during a treatment process. Typically, these are followed by effluent disposal or reuse. In order to understand wastewater treatment, the most important components to be understood are the biological process of wastewater treatment and the chemical process of wastewater treatment. It is important to know all parts of the system, the equipment, how the system works, the cost of the system, and the environmental impacts of the system, and to be able to design the system. The following are the components of a wastewater treatment system.
