found that the literature actually was, and the data sources cited in it, were in the field of group decision making. These authors, basing on the analysis of 100 studies, found that group decision making is not a new phenomenon (as it is in the current position) – and in fact that there is this position (and the existing field of research) – because this field and the state of the research were very young in the 1960s. The authors found that the field of group decision making was in a state of rapid growth (see Bassokian), which led them to a conclusion that, first, group decision making will continue to grow, and second, will be applied in 100 years, as the state of the field of group decision making was the state of the field of group decision making in 1960. What does this tell us about the relationship between the existing field and research itself? (see Bassokian).
