

me. Grief can take so many forms. When we were almost to the end, we pulled off onto a dirt road in Arizona to have a funeral for my marriage.

We found an ice scraper under the seat and dug a grave in the sand. I crouched down and pulled my marriage certificate out of a clear plastic sleeve. It was as cool and smooth as the day it was handed to me. I saw my signature in blue ink, a broken oath in my own handwriting. His signature was there too, and I didn't fight it when I felt sentimental. When he signed it, he really believed that he loved me. I knew that. The complicated truth sagged in my gut.

I put the two wedding bands and the papers in the sand, and lit a corner. Fire and wind pulled it all apart, one fleck of feathery ash at a time. I pressed my lips together and hummed quietly. It was the melody that played when I wore the white dress and made the promise. I wanted to end it the same way it started—with sincerity and finality and a song.

I pushed the sand back over the ashes and set a smooth white stone on top. My brother left for the car, and I stood silently with the cacti.

I breathed deep. Breathing is holy for me. My hands were dirty, and God's too. I closed my eyes and leaned into the sun, this time with a little more room for air.

A line from my favourite poem says this:

*"There'll be days like this, my mama said,
When you open your hands to catch,
And wind up with only blisters and bruises. ...
When your boots fill with rain, and you'll be up to your knees in disappointment.
And those are the very days you have all the more reason to say thank you.
Because there's nothing more beautiful than the way the ocean refuses to stop kissing the shoreline, no matter how many times it is sent away."*

I see mercy in the dusty sunlight that outlines the trees, in my mother's crooked hands, in the blanket my friend left for me, in the harmony of the wind chimes. It's not the mercy that I asked for, but it is mercy nonetheless. And I learn a new prayer: thank you. It's a prayer I don't mean yet, but will repeat until I do.
