Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for falls between nursing home residents who had fallen at least once during the previous year and those who had not. A cross-sectional survey of 106 nursing home residents was conducted. Residents were divided into two groups based on whether they had fallen at least once during the previous year. Data were collected on demographic characteristics, functional status, cognitive status, medication use, and environmental factors. Results showed that residents who had fallen at least once during the previous year had significantly higher rates of certain risk factors compared to those who had not fallen. These findings suggest that identifying and addressing risk factors for falls may help reduce the incidence of falls in nursing homes.
