

CAUTION*The max. load and load center

The load center distance is defined that the distance between the load center and the fork carriage or the front of the fork carriage. The max. load means the maximum load the truck can charge at the normal load center distance. The relation between the max. load and load center distance shows on the capacity chart. You should reduce the weight of load if the load center distance incline to the fork carriage.

CAUTION*Gravity center and stability

The combined gravity center that is composed of the forklift center and the load gravity center determine the stability of the truck.

When unloaded, the barycenter does not change. when loaded, the barycenter is determined by the truck and the load's center.

The barycenter is also determined by the lifting and tilting of the mast.

The combined center is determined by these factors:

- Load's size, weight and shape
- The lifting height
- The tilting angle
- The acceleration
- The radius of turning
- The road and grade's angle
- The attachments

CAUTION*The stable region of the load center

In order to make the truck stable, the combined center must be in the triangle which is made up of two points that the two front wheels attach ground and the midpoint of the back axle.

If the combined center is in the front tilting side, the two front wheels become two fulcrums, the truck will overturn. If the combined center departs the triangle, the trucks shall overturn in the corresponding direction.

The chart given shows the relation between the load center and the weight of loads.

Before loading, make sure that the load and the load center distance in the range of capacity chart. If the load's shape is complex, put the most weighty part on the inside of the forks, and close to the fork carriage.

CAUTION*Velocity and acceleration

One object will keep subsistence until force works on it. Also, a moving object will keep moving until force works on it. This is just inertia.

According to inertia, when truck starts moving, one force works backwards, and when truck stops moving, one force works forwards. So, it's dangerous to brake suddenly, because it causes one large force works forwards, and it's easy to cause truck overturn or load slide off.

When the forklift makes a turn, will exert a centrifugal force outward from the curve center. This strength pushes forklift outward and causes it to turn over. About stability region is very small, so decelerate when turning. If the cargo transported at the high position, it's easier to turn over.
