

Sylvania for '79

Digital remote control and VIR

A look at the evolutionary development of the Sylvania television chassis.

By Walter H. Schwartz

Since last examined in ET/D (January 1976), the Sylvania color television line has undergone many further evolutionary refinements, rather than a wholesale redesign.

These Sylvania color television receivers have been designed with considerable recognition of the problems of the servicer. The chassis pull back for easier access with the removal of two screws, labeling of the components and test points is good on both sides of the circuit boards, and most notably all transistors and ICs plug into sockets.

The Sylvania modular series

The modular series, which began earlier with the E03-4-5 chassis, incorporated GT-Matic, Sylvania's automatic self-adjusting color system, a vertical countdown IC and an exceptionally wide locking-range horizontal AFC. These last two circuits, locking the vertical sweep to the horizontal, through a counting circuit eliminated the customer hold controls. Sylvania considers these to have been the industry's first automatic color TV chassis.

For 1976, Sylvania offered the E11/E12 modular chassis in their top of the line sets. These chassis had 30kv high voltage for use with the "Dark-Lite 50" light absorbing glass faceplate picture tubes. The E20/E21 chassis, a non-modular unit, was used in the 17 and 19 inch (diagonal) sets and the E40 modular chassis with somewhat lower high voltage, was used in certain 21 and 25 inch (diagonal) sets.

The E20/E21 chassis were continued in the 1976-77 line, as was the E40. Sylvania at that time stated that the most important change was an improvement in both short term and long term reliability achieved through much more rigid control of component quality and of workmanship. The E41 and E42 were new numbers given to updated and upgraded versions of the E11 and E12 chassis. These used 21 position single knob control of UHF and VHF varactor tuners, with individual tuning potentiometers in each position. A new four lead safety retrace capacitor was also added to this chassis.

The 1977-78 line consisted of the E23-E24 non-modular chassis and the E44-E45-E46 modular sets. Sylvania stated advances in integrated circuits continued to upgrade picture quality and automatic correction to user controls.

Video enhancement

A new video processing IC and redesigned associated circuitry in these chassis provided automatic sharpness control as follows, referring to Fig. 1: Q902, the second video amplifier's output signal is developed across R914, a 1k ohm collector resistor. The signal is applied to Block B. Simultaneously, the video signal at pin No. 12 is fed through an unterminated lagging network R919, L919, C919, to pin No. 11. The unterminated lagging network reflects the signal at pin No. 11, back to pin No. 12. The twice delayed signal and the undelayed signal are differentially combined in Block C, resulting in the preshoot signal. Further differential processing develops the overshoot signal. These signals are combined with the video signal in Block C. The net result at pin No. 5 is the aperture corrected video signal containing the preshoot and overshoot enhancements.

Block A is a detection system that looks at the amount of peaking the viewer wants, and compares the peak amplitude of the overshoot and preshoot signal to R900, the peaking control setting. If the peaking signal level and the peak control setting are the same, no action takes place. However, should the peaking fall below the preference setting, the detector sees the difference and corrects the condition. It does this over a wide range of signal variations. All chassis also incorporated improvements in blanking (in the new video processor IC) automatic color level, color-contrast tracking and a new improved horizontal/sync/AGC IC.

The E46 introduced Sylvania's Random Access Digital Tuning (which will be examined later as carried over into the E49 chassis of the '79 line).

Advances for '79

The 1979 line uses the E45, E48 and E49 chassis and updated versions of the E24 and E25. The E48 and E49 are new modular chassis with 32kv high voltage for greater brightness
