Smith,1973-06-07 Diplomatic historians with their stress on rational decision making at the higher echelons of government have tended to overlook the importance of psychological and emotional forces in the shaping of American foreign policy Yet as the author of this brilliant account of American counter subversion during the years immediately preceding Pearl Harbor shows nondiplomatic factors often do play an important role in foreign policy Thus Professor Smith finds that right wing extremism during the Depression was directly linked with developments preceding American entrance into World War II Father Charles Coughlin the fascist radio priest from Royal Oak Michigan William Dudley Pelley the eccentric founder of the Silver Legion of America and Fritz Kuhn of the German American Bund were all in effect allowing their followers to transform their own alienation from American society into patriotic sentiment The ironic result was that the ideology of these subversives with its anti Semitism and totalitarian sympathies created a problem for respectable isolationists while helping the Roosevelt administration in its efforts to win sympathy for Great Britain Indeed the failure of noninterventionists to free themselves from imputed totalitarian sympathies largely a product of guilt by association provided the Roosevelt administration with incontrovertible evidence with which to frighten a nation into war Their cause had been damaged irreparably by the moral obtuseness hysteria and prejudice of their admirers the American countersubversives Beautifully written and cogently argued To Save a Nation also speaks to an American public currently preoccupied with both the limits of dissent and the civil rights of those who protest against government policy Publishers The National Union Catalog ,1963
