

Is Money Important For Happiness?

From reading self-help books to magazine articles, we are all too familiar with the idea that money cannot buy concepts like forgiveness, optimism, and relationships, yet the reality remains that for most people, things, like receiving a salary raise and or, even winning the lottery, seem like the key to true happiness. Sure, money can buy us a nice phone, a nice car, and even the house of our dreams, but is it really the answer to all our hopes and dreams? That is, is it really the answer to a truly fulfilling life? A long-debated question, many philosophers have often turned towards science to find out if there really is a correlation between a higher income and higher levels of happiness, frequently arriving to the same conclusion: Money cannot buy happiness. While money can buy us a better diet, a better healthcare, and ultimately even a better neighborhood, in the end, all it really does is boost life satisfaction, unable to buy us optimism, gratitude, and most primarily, love. Playing an integral role in our overall well-being, money will always remain a vital tool in our everyday lives, providing us with the most basic necessities like food and a shelter, but because it cannot buy all the other necessary components for a genuinely fulfilling life, it will ultimately never be able to buy us more than simple life satisfaction. Regardless of the fact that money cannot buy things like love and relationships, why is it that often times, people still correlate buying materialism like the latest iPhone or perhaps designer shoes with more happiness? Moreover, why is that buying the car or perhaps even house of our dreams usually result in no more than momentary joy? The answer to this, lies in the endless cycle of the "hedonic treadmill." Explaining how it is human nature to always yearn for more, the theory expounds how, "Happiness depends on how we feel relative to our peers. That is, if you win the lottery, you may think that moving into a mansion will make you happier but then look out the window and see that all your friends live in even bigger mansions," materialism thus resulting in only momentary joy (BBC). This goes to show that beyond basic life satisfaction, money cannot buy happiness, thus resulting in only momentary joy. That being said, many people- from philosophers to scientists- have long debated whether a higher income can really result in more happiness: Are people with higher wages really happier than those with a lower income? Although money can have its advantages, serving as an essential tool in our everyday lives, is it really the answer to a truly fulfilling life? That being said, what two specific research projects found in 2010, and again in 2015, is intriguing: Money can result in more happiness, but only to a certain extent, its only role limited to providing life satisfaction. In a study led by the Weatherhead School of Management at Case Western University, it was found that an addition of one dollar per work hour had a much greater impact in boosting positive feelings and overall happiness for those in the 20th percentile income than those in the 80th percentile income who unexpectedly received no or even, decreased levels of happiness (CNBC). This shows that while money can certainly result in increased levels of happiness, it is most often only to a certain extent. That is, once a person's basic necessities have been met for the most principal level of life satisfaction, money ceases to have
