The above considerations, concerning the data collection approach, are justified only if you handle continuous variables as you did with the variable "mean number of days to repair." Otherwise, use of this approach would involve errors in computing rates. For instance, if a case requires only three days to complete repair work, but the repair is not yet complete, the repair time would be recorded as four days, because the day was spent in the repair shop. In addition, you would also have to consider the possibility that some cases might be coded as having completed work when they are not. Furthermore, continuous data can change over time, so that all cases ultimately qualify. Under these circumstances, the data collection is flawed.
