Stress is predominantly self-perceived, although it is possible to experience a stressor and not perceive it as stressful (spontaneous coping).

Spontaneous coping strategies are positive self-encouragement, distraction, self-talk, healthy self-talk, self-compassion, or denial of stressors (often maladaptive).

Spontaneous coping is dependent on:

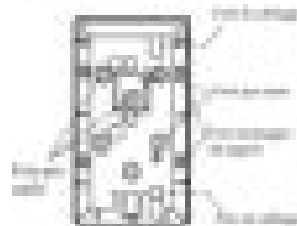

- A person's past experiences (trauma). People who experience trauma, past stressors, or stressors perceived but not experienced, will:
- Exhibit elevated cortisol levels (stress) even in non-stressful situations (hyperactive stress response).

Stressors • Health, safety, or security threats • Personal financial hardship • Illness • Loss • Difficult living environment

People engage in self-encouragement to avoid their own limitations (self-talk) or to affirm their own strengths (self-talk).
