14. The historical role of technology in the development of infrastructure is a much broader question than the limited one suggested by the title. I therefore will address a more subtle question: what are the political and social implications of the technological changes that have shaped infrastructure? Infrastructure is a social construct, and the infrastructure that we have today is the result of a long and complex process of social and political negotiation. The infrastructure that we have today is the result of a long and complex process of social and political negotiation. The infrastructure that we have today is the result of a long and complex process of social and political negotiation.
