Tillack,T. Brock,O. Hesse,S. Lehné,2009 Self contained underwater breathing apparatus SCUBA divers use different mixtures of nitrogen and oxygen as breathing gas The so called NITROX mixture often contains more oxygen than is contained in air and may increase the fire hazard in diving equipment The SCUBA diving community however still differentiates between NITROX mixtures that contain more than 40 % oxygen or less They consider a mixture with up to 40 % oxygen often as regular air In filling operations of SCUBA cylinders gas flows from high pressure to low pressure Because of compressive heating a sudden temperature rise in the gas occurs and nonmetallic materials e g seals may ignite BAM has used the pneumatic impact test to investigate the ignition sensitivity of ethylene propylene diene monomer EPDM fluorelastomer FPM polytetrafluorethylene PTFE polyetheretherketone PEEK and nylon PA 6 6 to gaseous impacts in synthetic air in various NITROX mixtures and in pure oxygen The test results clearly show that for nonmetallic materials the maximum pressure of nonreaction in NITROX mixtures decreases at a content of 29

% oxygen in comparison to those in air In addition autoignition temperatures of the nonmetallic materials were also determined The findings of this investigation support very well the results of other publications on oxygen enrichment As a consequence of this study in SCUBA diving the same safety requirements for NITROX mixtures with more than 21 % oxygen should be applied as for pure oxygen in the industry
