

Les hydrocarbures

7918

Un siècle et demi d'exploitation

Des millions d'années de décomposition de matière organique ont donné naissance aux hydrocarbures, piégés dans des réservoirs naturels souterrains. Dès l'Antiquité, ces hydrocarbures découverts de façon fortuite dans des nappes superficielles ont été exploités localement. 1859 est cependant l'année de naissance du pétrole moderne : le 27 août, un Américain fore le premier puits en Pennsylvanie. Ce premier forage ouvre la voie d'une utilisation massive de l'or noir. Une industrie se met en place, associant extraction, transport et raffinage, entre les mains de grandes compagnies. Progressivement, le marché s'étend au reste du monde. Le décalage entre les sites de production et les lieux de consommation devient un enjeu majeur pour les puissances européennes qui cherchent à sécuriser leur approvisionnement. Leur concurrence pour l'appropriation des ressources est particulièrement forte au Moyen-Orient. Longtemps marginalisée en raison notamment des contraintes liées au transport, la production de gaz se généralise dans la seconde moitié du XX<sup>e</sup> siècle. Les avantages qu'il présente par rapport au pétrole (moins d'émissions de CO<sub>2</sub>, répartition des ressources) en font une source d'énergie très demandée. Cependant, le caractère fini des réserves, la hausse de la demande et la recherche d'une sécurité énergétique, conduisent certains pays à se tourner vers de nouveaux fronts énergétiques.
