Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 10-week, 12-session, 120-min, group-based, self-help, and self-management program on the self-efficacy, self-management, and self-monitoring of 100 patients with type 2 diabetes. The program was designed to help patients understand the importance of self-management and self-monitoring, and to provide them with the necessary skills and resources to do so. The program was evaluated using a pre-test, post-test, and follow-up design. The results showed that the program had a significant positive effect on the self-efficacy, self-management, and self-monitoring of the patients. The program was well-received by the patients, and the authors concluded that it is a valuable tool for improving the self-management and self-monitoring of patients with type 2 diabetes.

Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were 20 men, aged 40-50 years, who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease. They were randomly assigned to either a control group or a training group. The training group participated in a 12-week program of aerobic exercise, three times per week, for 45 minutes per session. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. Physical fitness was measured at baseline and at 12 weeks using a variety of tests, including a maximal aerobic capacity test, a submaximal aerobic capacity test, and a resting heart rate test. Health was measured at baseline and at 12 weeks using a variety of tests, including a blood pressure test, a cholesterol test, and a glucose test. The results of the study showed that the training group had significantly higher physical fitness and better health than the control group at 12 weeks. The training program was effective in improving physical fitness and health in sedentary middle-aged men.
