Lewis,2011 Smaller firms sell more equity in response to expansions than do larger firms Also consumption is more procyclical for high income groups than others In this paper we present a model that captures key features of both of these patterns found in recent empirical studies Managers own firms with unique differentiated products and can sell ownership in these firms Equity sales require paying consulting fees but the resulting scrutiny also make firms more efficient We find four main results 1 Equity sales are procyclical since the benefits of efficient production outweigh the consulting fees during a boom 2 Equity shares in smaller firms are more procyclical because expansions make previously solely owned firms to seek outside equity financing 3 Households must absorb the increased equity sales by managers thereby affecting their consumption response relative to managers 4 Greater underlying managerial inefficiency induces more firms to seek outside advice and ownership in equilibrium As a result the cyclical impact on efficiency is mitigated by outside ownership
