Abstract: This study investigated self-reported attitudes toward sexual assault in the United States. Data from the 2007 National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (Add Health) were analyzed. Results show that 61% of the sample reported attitudes that were consistent with the National Sexual Violence Research Center's (2007) findings that most Americans believe that sexual assault is a crime. However, only 33% of the sample reported attitudes that were consistent with the National Sexual Violence Research Center's (2007) findings that most Americans believe that sexual assault is preventable. Results suggest that the majority of the sample did not believe that sexual assault was preventable, which is a finding that is inconsistent with the National Sexual Violence Research Center's (2007) findings. Results also suggest that the majority of the sample did not believe that sexual assault was a crime, which is a finding that is inconsistent with the National Sexual Violence Research Center's (2007) findings.
