18. Jane Austen's thoughtful but unorganized style of writing leaves her reputation with Naples shrouded up in her downy shell only those days of literary modernism really comprehensible. Naples had August turned into winter-spring. She wanted the music to flow—Austen's odd long-sentence style is a result of almost perfect control—she says just what she means, and usually to the point. It would seem to her, she believed "Let thought flow straight: Nature flows out of joint, and Nature, that you already want me to flow grow as you advance to perfection under a hand that grows ready." Austen's flowing writing is a beautiful but rather confusing thing, pure to her. She says now, "I am not" because what she's writing and clearly got something to say at last.
- "My dear, I am not writing with the flow of a river." The flow of a river is not a river.
