London's Heart Benjamin Leopold Farjeon, 1874 The scene opens in the locality of Soho that labyrinth of narrow paths which always wears a depressed and melancholy air as if it had just gone into mourning If Soho ever had bright days in the shape of a sunny youth it must have been very long ago No trace of them remains a settled sadness lies upon its queer narrow thoroughfares now and for evermore The very voices of its residents are more subdued and resigned than other voices are in other places No locality in London contains so strange a variety of life's phases as may be found in Soho And yet it is full of mystery and its ways are dark and secret Men and women may live there for years and their antecedents and present modes of life shall be as little known as if they lived in the most remote corner of the earth Soho is the molehill of the Great City You may have a thousand pounds a year and spend it in Soho and your neighbours not only shall not notice it but shall be as utterly indifferent to you as if you lived on tenpence a day as hundreds of poor fellows are doing at this present moment Hard working mechanics live there weary eyed needlewomen libertines ballet girls whose salary is twenty shillings a week and who wear furs and false hair and diamond rings and man owls who sleep by day and prey by night
