

Life in the medieval times

Throughout the medieval time period intellectual life suffered greatly, and it is visible in how the people lived. During what was once “The dark ages” (now medieval times) there was much despair and poverty, and money was unevenly balanced between lower classes and higher classes. Due to this, life of the lower classes were incredibly different from those of a higher class. Reading William Manchester’s A World Lit Only By Fire portrayed the differences in life between these classes through the food, the homes they lived in, and health. One of the major way the two classes were seperated was the food that they ate and even how they ate it at times. Throughout history food has always been a key to wealth and the higher class, and the medieval times were no exception.

The peasants, the lowest class harvested the fields and ate some of what they collected while some of it went to those they harvested for. But during the worst of seasons Manchester wrote the peasants were “forced to sell all they owned, including their pitifully inadequate clothing, and be reduced to nudity in all seasons.”(Manchester 54). But in the times when they had no more to sell they would eat “Bark, roots, grass; even white clay” and Manchester goes on to say “Cannibalism was not unknown. Strangers and travelers were waylaid and killed to be eaten, and there are tales of gallows being torn down --- as many as twenty bodies would hang from a single scaffold --- by men frantic to eat the warm flesh raw.”(Manchester 54). Manchester tells of a story of a peasant revived by the smell of animal waste after passing out at the smells of a perfume shop, meant to show the level of dirtiness that the peasants were accustomed to. But the higher the class the more safety there was for food resources, and kings would never go hungry, due to their immense wealth they could buy up even the smallest bits of food.
