Introduction

This module is designed to assess the developmental processes, characteristics of an embryo, and how changes to the system during pregnancy and the postnatal period.

Objectives

After reading this module's lab module, you should be able to: (1) Describe the process of fertilization (2) Compare and contrast embryonic and fetal development and its developmental changes across the range systems of a female during pregnancy and the postnatal period.

Introduction

Human development is a process that begins at fertilization and continues through the prenatal and postnatal periods. The process begins with the fertilization of an egg and a sperm cell, which results in a zygote. The zygote then develops into an embryo, which is the early stage of development. The embryo then develops into a fetus, which is the later stage of development. The fetus then develops into a newborn, which is the final stage of development. The process of development is a continuous one, and it is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and nutrition. The process of development is also a process of growth, and it is characterized by the increase in size and complexity of the organism over time. The process of development is a process of change, and it is characterized by the transformation of the organism from a single cell into a complex organism. The process of development is a process of learning, and it is characterized by the acquisition of knowledge and skills over time. The process of development is a process of becoming, and it is characterized by the realization of the organism's potential over time.

After the sperm meets the egg, the fertilization process begins. The fertilized egg cell, which is now a zygote, begins to divide. The zygote divides into two cells, which then divide into four cells. The four cells then divide into eight cells, and so on. The cells are now called blastomeres. The blastomeres are the early stage of development. The blastomeres then develop into a morula, which is a ball of cells. The morula then develops into a blastocyst, which is a hollow ball of cells. The blastocyst then implants itself in the uterine wall. The blastocyst then develops into a fetus. The fetus is the later stage of development. The fetus then develops into a newborn. The newborn is the final stage of development. The process of development is a continuous one, and it is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and nutrition. The process of development is also a process of growth, and it is characterized by the increase in size and complexity of the organism over time. The process of development is a process of learning, and it is characterized by the acquisition of knowledge and skills over time. The process of development is a process of becoming, and it is characterized by the realization of the organism's potential over time.

After the fetus is born, the development process continues. The newborn is now a child, and it begins to learn and grow. The child then develops into a young person, and it begins to learn and grow. The young person then develops into an adult, and it begins to learn and grow. The adult then develops into an elderly person, and it begins to learn and grow. The process of development is a continuous one, and it is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetics, environment, and nutrition.
