Maguire, Carol L. Chambers,2005 The College of Forestry Integrated Research Project CFIRP is an on going experiment in the eastern Coast Range foothills of western Oregon Started in 1989 a team of scientists resource managers and students at Oregon State University designed and implemented silvicultural alternatives to clearcutting These silvicultural practices aimed to create and retain features of mature and old growth Douglas fir Pseudotsuga menziesii forests while also producing timber Fine moderate and large scale natural disturbance patterns served as the basis for prescriptions The study includes replicates of three silvicultural treatments n 27 stands wherein 33% to 95% of the timber volume was removed three non replicated demonstration treatments wherein 33% of timber volume was removed in variable sized and shaped patches and untreated controls n 3 stands Additionally clumped or randomly distributed snags were created from green trees in each stand In this book CFIRP scientists describe harvest challenges and economics short term 10 yr responses of vegetation wildlife and humans to silvicultural treatments and additional studies conducted using CFIRP study sites A synopsis of past and present research and management directions also is included Work continues on CFIRP today and data collected from previous studies are available to other researchers By comparing characteristics of forests managed under different silvicultural systems we will be better able to assess their potential economic social and ecological contributions to managed forest landscapes Wood Industry Abstracts ,1982
