1. Another key role for the foreign investment model would be to set minimum, global agreement objectives (including long- and short-term foreign investment commitments) within a framework for flexible bilateral investment agreements. These targets to focus the countries. For the 1990s, there have been an appreciation of interest of more than 10% against the dollar and 10% against the yen, which is the average of the 1980s. Although the dollar and yen have both appreciated, the average appreciation of the Japanese Yen is 10%. If currency systems have been more than 10% against the dollar, the general situation, that is, a 10% appreciation of the dollar, would be a good indicator for a general situation, that is, a 10% appreciation of the dollar.
2. The other important role for the model is to help the host country to set a good target for the foreign investment. This would include the current account balance, which was 10% of gross domestic product (GDP) in 1980. The country would negotiate at the host country through investment incentives, which will be more than 10% of GDP. The host country would be able to set a good target for the foreign investment, which is a good indicator for the host country.
3. The model would also help to set a good target for the host country, which will be more than 10% of GDP. The host country would be able to set a good target for the foreign investment, which is a good indicator for the host country.
4. The model would also help to set a good target for the host country, which will be more than 10% of GDP. The host country would be able to set a good target for the foreign investment, which is a good indicator for the host country.
