Subject: Format of engineering memo format

This memo is to form the general format of an engineering memo. This first paragraph is intended to give a general statement of the intent and purpose of the memo. This paragraph should never exceed four or five lines of text. All other information should appear in the following paragraphs.

The main body of an engineering memo is designed to convey the bulk of the information and should be separated by an extra space from the opening paragraph to set it off. As a general rule, an engineering memo should not exceed two pages, not counting attachments, with either single or 1.5 spacing (memos are never to be double spaced), however this is not a limit, but a guideline. It is important to use as many pages as required to convey the required information. No matter how many pages are included, they should all be concise and to the point. The header indicates who the memo is to. In the case of this course, that will generally be your TA or myself. The "from" line needs to list all the participants. In this case, include all the group members if it is a group project or just yourself if it is an individual assignment. The date should be the date you create the memo, and the subject line should include a few words to indicate the subject of the memo, including the name of the experiment.

The body of the memo is going to describe whatever information needs to be conveyed. In the business world, these memos are used to formalize information that has been discussed, or to convey results of tests that have been requested. This could include what tests were run, what the general results were and any special information, such as problems or difficulties. For this course, if you are asked to submit in a memo format, you should write enough that the audience can understand what you did, how you did it in general terms and any conclusions. For this course, some assignments will ask specific questions, which will be answered in this section as well. Graphs can be placed in the body if they are imperative to understanding the text of the memo, but should be limited. If there are a lot of graphs they are better placed in an attachment, labeled and referenced in the text.

Graphs and charts should follow standards for good engineering graphs, and all attachments must be labeled and referenced in the body. As an example, you might say that you have attached the detailed schematics of the project showing all components, wiring layouts and functional blocks as requested. Another possible example might be that you have included the raw data or summary data for such and such of a test. If attachments are made, they must be well labeled so the reader can easily discern each attachment. You would not, for example, want to include eleven pages of raw data in tabular form, followed by eleven pages of post processed data in tabular form without somehow indicating what they were. You would also not want to include data that is not needed. For instance, consider the eleven
