

Critical Appraisal of the Use of Sports Massage

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Sports massage is becoming increasingly common at the amateur level, which helps support a multimillion-pound industry of professional therapists and massage tools. The purpose of sports massage is to assist athletes before, during, and after training. It benefits everybody who exercises since it increases flexibility, prevents injuries, and aids in recovery from traumatic injuries. Although sports massage has advantages such as enhanced recuperation, heightened performance, and injury prevention, it is also costly and time-consuming. Consequently, it is essential to outline the evidence justifying such an action. The research articles used in this critical analysis show that sports massage makes people less tired, lessens the effects of core stability training, and improves their physical, mental, and emotional health.

Low back discomfort that is chronic and non-specific is treated with sports massage. Standard therapies include massage therapy and lumbopelvic stability training for pain reduction and stabilization of low back pain. There has never been any research on the benefits of sports massage therapy in managing chronic non-specific low back pain in elite weightlifters. However, Joseph et al. (2018) examined how professional weightlifters with non-specific low back pain responded to the therapeutic effects of lumbopelvic stability training and sports massage treatment on pain intensity, pain pressure threshold, and tissue blood flow. Sixteen female weightlifters training for international and Olympic competitions were randomly allocated to cross-over experiments in the study's balanced design. Sports massage therapy and lumbopelvic stability training were randomly allocated to the athletes for three sessions, with a 24-hour gap between each treatment and a four-week washout period. In both intervention groups, measurements of tissue blood flow, pain pressure threshold, and intensity were taken before and after each session.

Repeated-measures analysis of variance was used to look at variations in pain intensity, pain pressure threshold, and tissue blood flow. Participants in both intervention groups exhibited improvements in their tissue blood flow, a reduction in pain intensity, and a pain pressure threshold, according to Joseph et al. (2018). On the other hand, the lumbopelvic stability training group had a greater propensity toward
