To present an effective argument, you must not only support and defend your position, but also consider the other side of the story—the counterargument—and refute it. Arrange your support in a logical manner to make your case as persuasive as possible.

Directions: Read the paragraph below from an argumentative essay and answer the question that follows.

While many people may not realize it, the government is already monitoring the Internet responsibly. A report by Google states that the U.S. government submitted only 123 requests to remove content from the Internet between July 1 and December 31, 2009, and Google agreed to comply with 80% of them. According to Google's top lawyer, David Drummond, the "vast majority of such requests are legitimate, such as removing child pornography." Clearly, the U.S. government is not abusing its powers in such cases but is actually taking steps to prevent illegal material from spreading.

Which of the following is not used to prove the writer's claim that the government is already monitoring the Internet responsibly?

The writer anticipates the opposition with a direct quotation from Google's top lawyer.

The writer uses a fact about the small number of requests that the U.S. government has made to remove content from Google.
