Starr,1998 Minerals units at the secondary level are commonly introduced with textbook information that defines describes and classifies minerals This introduction gives the students a background on the topic after which they are exposed to laboratory exercises designed to test and identify selected mineral samples While such an approach seems logical to many instructors an alternative approach is to implement discovery learning to allow the students to have laboratory experiences before the textbook information is covered Such an approach gives the student real experience he/she can relate to when the more formal textbook material is presented In an attempt to determine the superior approach to minerals instruction I implemented a plan to teach some of my classes with a traditional method of book learning first followed by labs while other classes would receive just the opposite a structured discovery learning unit labs first book learning second Throughout the unit and at the end of the semester a variety of records were kept pertaining to student performance These records were compared upon completion of the minerals unit to determine the degree of success of each teaching method The data gathered throughout the research showed a higher degree of comprehension and performance for the group of students instructed using the discovery learning approach However out of concern that perhaps the groups were not truly heterogeneous I checked the grade point average of each student involved with the research at the end of that semester and compiled averages for both groups in question The resulting data displayed only a nine hundredths difference in grade point averages between the groups further supporting the idea that the method of discovery learning is a superior teaching method compared to the traditional approach
