

Lab Exercise 38.C: Evidence of Hereditary Material

Some studies have shown that cells of a single bacterial culture, when independently subjected to independent generations, show hereditary effects in subsequent generations. In fact, this is not surprising in light of the fact that the genetic material of a cell is passed on to its daughter cells. The hereditary effects are not the result of the environment, but of the hereditary material that is passed on to the daughter cells. (Figure 38.C)

Control and hereditary effects on bacterial growth

The following is an illustration of the hereditary effects of bacterial growth.
