Attending college is worth it. Students who a college education and graduate have many more life changing opportunities than those who don 't; the debates of studying after high school has been ongoing for countless years, but statistics have proven that majority to all students who go to college achieve more life goals than the average high school graduate. The unemployment rate in 2013 for college graduates that were older than 25 was 3.6% as to high school graduates which was 7.5%. Numerous employers look for someone who has a degree to work in their company. It shows them that the person seeking the job cares enough to improve themselves, are responsible, work well under stress, carries out good decisions, and much more. One who attends college knows that it is a lot more difficult than high school and it helps one grow as a person. Employers value these types of workers in their business.College graduates are more likely to receive greater benefits from their jobs. Many, compared to high school graduates, are given access health insurance and/or retirement plans; they receive about $6,000 more in a year in retirement income than high school graduates do. Companies offer greater health benefits such as insurance to people with higher degrees or a degree at all. They make sure that their employer is in good shape and feels welcomed working in the business so that they will stay there longer providing their services.If bounteous amounts of people...
