team from Arizona State University ASU evaluated the effectiveness of simulator based training for snowplow drivers as a new dimension in ADOT s winter maintenance training program The primary focus was on driver response to simulator training and the effectiveness of that training in terms of public safety and potential cost savings Clear quantitative results on this small scale have been limited but two years of experience with simulator trained snowplow operators in Arizona has resulted in optimism about the potential of simulators as an integral part of a comprehensive winter maintenance and driver skill training program Based on the Year Two results from Globe and new personnel training needs ADOT procured two more simulators for Holbrook and Flagstaff Districts in mid 2006 A Working Group was formed of field trainers from the three simulator districts to refine and focus the training courses A new third year study will expand on this analysis with a focus on results of training in proper gear shifting a control level skill to improve fuel efficiency and to reduce repair costs As the study proceeds it will continue to evaluate the simulators effectiveness providing quantitative documentation to reinforce the qualitative results and to define broader benefits of the driving simulator for heavy equipment operations Justice of the Peace ,2001 Taxicab Industry ,1960
